Regenerative practice reconciles the best of the past with the potential of the future. It implies recognizing, relearning, and remembering our participatory role as a species in the larger living world. Building regenerative capacity begins with working on ourselves as unique individuals. It calls upon each of us to observe carefully, think ecologically, design systemically, and act humbly. To do so, we need to evolve our own capacity, and the capacity of our communities, to serve the larger whole systems within which we are nested, concentrating nodal efforts where they will have the greatest systemic impact for the least effort.

Join us as we explore what it means to fully engage in a regenerative practice to produce regenerative living systems focused design.
